DraftSight 2020 Full Crack is an extremely easy and very powerful tool for any .Q: How to generate one-off error for command line cmdlets in script using I want to throw an ArgumentException when a user is trying to use a custom cmdlet with some invalid parameters. This means the user has not called it with a valid set of parameters and thus is causing unnecessary exceptions to be thrown for them. I've seen the the accepted answer here, which uses the AtLeastOneOf() method: (The previous code would generate one exception per invalid parameter, which was far more suitable.) I haven't been able to make it work with this error pattern, which shows up on the command line (I only want to get this for cmdlets used through the framework, not console users): There is no parameters value with the name 'BlahBlahBlah' that matches parameter [BlahBlahBlah] It seems AtLeastOneOf() works to a degree, but it isn't a very convenient way to do it. It works as intended in the first exception: Command 'Blah' returned an invalid status code '1' and the following diagnostic messages: There is no parameter with the name 'BlahBlahBlah' that matches parameter 'BlahBlahBlah'. The following diagnostic messages were written to the error stream: There is no parameter with the name 'BlahBlahBlah' that matches parameter 'BlahBlahBlah'. The following diagnostic messages were written to the error stream: What I want, is, for it to go a level deeper and get an appropriate error: There is no parameter with the name 'BlahBlahBlah' that matches parameter 'BlahBlahBlah'. The following diagnostic messages were written to the error stream: My minimum desired output would be something like the following, which I don't have any way to do with AtLeastOneOf(): There is no parameter with the name 'BlahBlahBl
