Observer: Two feet apart? Nah, Tony Share This Tony Romo insists he could play quarterback and punt if necessary. "I think we can do either," he said at the Pro Bowl last week. "I understand punting. I played it in high school and college. That's fun to me." A fun way to make a living. The Cowboys quarterback said he was just kidding around in another example of his unguarded personality in a candid meeting with reporters. [More photos from the Pro Bowl here.] As Romo walked up to the podium for a Q&A session with fans, the question was whether he would take on the duties of punter if Stephen Jones ever called for a fake punt. "No, man," he said. "I don't think I could do that." True to form, he added: "I can do all the handoffs if I have to." Romo has joked about his position change many times, but he has spent most of his pro career playing quarterback. He was the starter for most of the first six years of his career in Dallas, when he threw for more than 5,200 yards and was a four-time Pro Bowl selection. He has spent the last six seasons playing backup, and he was voted the league's most valuable player by the Associated Press in 2009. "It's all fun, but the responsibility is what you want it to be," he said. "I like to play quarterback, but at the end of the day, if you've got to take your team down the field with two guys and a whole football team, you would want to be the one who knows how to do that." For all the jokes made about him, Romo has been pretty successful. He was 24-12 as a starter in the regular season and is 42-31 as a backup. He doesn't have much experience punting, but he's confident he could do the job. He wants to remain the starter for the foreseeable future, though the team can always turn to Kellen Moore. Both players have contracts that could easily be extended. As for Romo, well, the verdict is still out.Just a quick one from way back in April. My lovely brother suggested

Intestinal membrane-transporting proteins: structure, function and role in health and disease. This mini review article will briefly describe the major transporters of the intestinal mucosa and review the spectrum of transport functions in health and disease as described for four transporters: peptide transporter, sodium-dependent bile acid transporter, sodium/taurocholate cotransporting polypeptide and sugar transporter. Peptide transporter, the first protein cloned for a human intestinal transmembrane transporter, was cloned from cloned murine and human intestinal mRNAs and independently from cDNA of human jejunal epithelium. Bile acid transporter is a transmembrane protein encoded by the SLC10A2 gene (solute carrier family 10 (sodium/bile acid cotransporter)). Since the initial isolation of sodium/taurocholate cotransporting polypeptide as a major apical Na+-dependent uptake of bile salts, this protein has been the focus of more than 10 years of research focusing on its pharmacokinetics, cloning and function. Sugar transporter is a high-affinity glucose transporter that mediates the uptake of glucose into intestinal cells. In humans, variants of the gene that encode the glucose transporter have been identified and may influence the regulation of the blood glucose concentration. Structure-function relationships, substrate specificity, tissue distribution and physiological roles for the four transporters that were reviewed will also be discussed.A recent study by the Federal Reserve found that the U.S. economy, while solid in 2019, was producing slightly below potential output. In addition, the nation's unemployment rate, which had already reached 4.4 percent, ticked up to 4.5 percent. In other words, despite record job gains and falling labor-force participation since 2010, America's workforce could still be producing more. Given that productivity per worker has been growing at a sluggish annual rate of just 2.2 percent, it's possible we could actually produce more with fewer people in the field. If that seems unlikely, consider the number of people working in each profession. As a percentage of the country's population, farmers make up a tiny slice of the labor force (1.5 percent). But that number is large by labor-force standards, as a 2013 Government Accountability Office report found. There are more than 200,000 farmers in the United States, including 75
