What's new in Play The Fox:

Hello everyone, welcome to my first "Character Design" post. I'm Robotpencil, and below you'll find some stuff I've done so far. The characters featured in this blog post will be used as the basis for a prospective story I'm currently planning. I've also been exploring a few new inspiration pieces that I may be working on next. But first, I want to thank each and every one of you for making my journey as an artist something I look forward to every single day. So without further ado, here are the characters. I will discuss these characters in more detail over the coming weeks and months, but this blog will showcase more of my creations so please find below links to my portfolio and remain tuned for more. The first thing you need to know about me is that I'm an artist, a concept artist in particular. I also work as a freelance graphic designer, and I've worked in many different environments and professions. The reason I'm turning my attention to artist creations is to see if I can actually branch out of Graphic Design and get into development. But, in all honesty, this is just something that I want to take a shot at for fun, and I may or may not pursue it (I haven't decided yet). My goal with these characters was to create very realistic and believable characters and environments. My inspiration for this project came from several things, my love of the craftspeople of the 18th and 19th century, and the film industry. The Craftspeople I thought I'd pick up a few tricks here and there from them during this project, and I really enjoyed the whole process of crafting things. One of the best parts of it all was being able to experiment with new tools and new techniques. After sculpting the shapes of each component in Zbrush (I personally love Zbrush for this sort of thing), I created the modeling of the game prototypes in 3DS Max. All the primary modelwork was done in there, and then the 2D Art for the characters were created for final packaging. As you can see, I worked on the face and proportions of each character to create a more down to earth presentation of them, but I also really enjoyed creating the whole environment and planning out how it would look on the screen. I included new props to help visualize how each environment would look in the
