A link to a story about how Iran is cracking down on internet access following the recent presidential election. Specifically it appears to be against any sort of connection with the outside world. This is what: There were around 500,000 internet users in Iran in 2011. The government is now apparently banning access to social media websites such as Facebook, Twitter and YouTube. The government-operated Research and Technology Organization (RTO) is responsible for managing the internet network, which was supplied by the big three mobile operators. It blocked access to the website of the Iran Computer Emergency Response Team (CERT) I understand that the data is stored on servers, and the servers are owned by the companies who supply them, so to say. But the internet is a network and multiple servers can be used in the exact same way as if they were all from a single company. Also, the internet is public, so the concept of "private" and "public" is meaningless, and all of the information is publicly available for anyone to read on a website, with the exception of the encrypted data. So how exactly is this blocked? How is any company allowed access to the information, but then all of a sudden everyone is stopped from accessing it? A: Iran is actually trying to ban it's citizens from accessing the internet. While the mobile networks and infrastructure are under the domain of state-run companies, individual users (from access points controlled by private companies) must have a government-issued SIM card to access the networks. Therefore, if the government wants to block access to the internet, they just need to block the SIMs. Users who were previously accessing the internet using a different SIM may be required to change it (because it is government issued), and those who won't switch may need to access the networks using Wi-Fi networks, which are completely independent of the telecoms.
