I have heard that tissue paper is usually made out of flax or similar material. What I find particularly odd about this type of paper, is the fact that when I get a certain amount (not very much) of it in my hands, the pieces of paper twist themselves into long twisted string-like objects - Is it just that the fibres are too wide for the paper's structure (see first picture)? Is it possible to make paper out of a material as brittle as flax that can be rolled into thin long sheets like this? Are those irregularities a common problem for these types of paper? A: Lignin, a common component of wood, is definitely a flammable material and is what makes pulp into paper. Pulp fibers can be made from many plant stems. The common term for pulp fibers is "fiber" but really it's the fluffy, hollow part of a plant stem. People can use almost any stem part to make pulp. Wheat straw would be a common source of pulp fiber. That is a plant stem all hollow but not hollow right down to the wood. Flax plant stems are not hollow, they have hard wood sheaths that the stalk grows out of. Lignin is what makes flax useful for making paper. But just because flax is very strong, doesn't mean that the fibres are very wide. Common width for flax are 10-14 microns, which is, not extremely wide. What you're seeing is more that paper
