Brain changes in chronic low back pain. Chronic low back pain (CLBP) with a duration of more than 12 months is the most common health problem. It is known that CLBP has a significant negative impact on mental health and quality of life, leading to a substantial burden on the individuals and society. CLBP patients have shown a variety of symptoms such as cognitive and emotional problems, other pain, fatigue, sleep disorders, depression, poor self-management, and functional disability. These symptoms are commonly associated with brain dysfunction, and they can result in a negative prognosis for patients with CLBP. In this review, we systematically searched the literature and found that most studies regarding neuroimaging in CLBP were case-control studies. A total of 28 studies were identified. The findings of the 28 studies suggest that the most common brain changes in CLBP are structural changes. More specifically, decreased volume of the prefrontal cortex, increased volume of the thalamus, and impaired integrity of white matter tracts have been revealed. The structure changes in the prefrontal cortex, thalamus, and white matter tracts may be the basis for increased mental distress, cognitive dysfunction, and functional disability in CLBP patients.

Everyday you read the news, and it's never a time when you don't hear about sexual harassment. No, it's almost always about women. The #MeToo movement, which set off the current wave of awareness about sexual harassment, has not been silent about men. After all, pretty much every woman you know has experienced sexual harassment. (It's something that happens when you least expect it, such as in a shopping mall, an office or a restaurant.) But for men, this harassment is usually an issue where it is tolerated and overlooked. "We're only aware of what happens to the women and girls," says Patrick Edidin, a New York-based Emmy-winning TV producer and former executive at NBC. He recalls being groped by an "alpha male" at a bar in Manhattan. While she was drunk at the time, and didn't understand what was happening, the incident upset her and she talked about it. Only later did he realize that she was talking about him. "I thought, 'I'm not the only guy out there,'" he says. "You want to keep it private and not be bothered by it. That's one of the worst things that can happen to someone." It is this lack of awareness of what's being done to men that is at the heart of the problem and why there needs to be far more awareness about what is happening to men. Here are some of the issues that men face in the workplace: Men And Women Are Different "Men are different," says Seema Sheikh, founder of the Center for WorkLife Law at the University of California-Berkeley. "Women are socialized to not report harassment because they are taught that they deserve it. They are taught that it's the man's responsibility. If a man is harassed he has to take the bull by the horns, which could expose him to further abuse. And if the man reports it, there's a belief that it will escalate if he doesn't stand up for himself. The whole issue of men in general standing up for themselves in hostile situations is hard for people to understand. "Men are taught to step back and take the high road. The reason is the threat of losing your job or being taken over in business is significant. It's important that one person doesn't make a
