diagnosis of gastroschisis. To determine the value of antenatal diagnosis of gastroschisis, we reviewed the fetal outcome of pregnancies with this diagnosis.
We report all clinically recognized

cases of gastroschisis diagnosed from January 1, 1984 to December 31, 1985. Fetuses with gastroschisis were divided into those with low birth weight (less than 2,500 g) and birth weight (greater than 2,500 g). There were 12 cases of gastroschisis diagnosed antenatally by ultrasound examination (age, 24 to 41 weeks). One fetus was aborted, two were lost to follow-up, and nine were delivered by induced labor at term. There were five infants weighing less than 2,500 g and seven infants weighing more than 2,500 g. There were no maternal or fetal complications. We conclude that antenatal diagnosis of gastroschisis does not routinely require early delivery, is not associated with increased fetal morbidity or mortality, and affords the opportunity to offer elective neonatal surgical treatment at a time when appropriate outcome data can be accumulated. Detection of volatile organic compounds (VOCs) in exhaled breath is a growing field in biomedical research. Volatile

organic compounds (VOCs) are present in exhaled breath. The principle source is metabolism of drugs and other chemicals by the liver and breath alcohol is an example of a VOC that is specifically produced in the liver and released into the lungs. The long-term goal of this research is to characterize both the effects of endogenous VOCs and exogenous chemicals and to track their changes following exposure to drugs or disease. The major objectives of the present application are to characterize the time course of the elimination of endogenous VOCs after exposure to drugs, and to study the kinetics of exogenous VOCs administered through inhalation. The working hypothesis is that VOCs are generated by the liver following exposure to drugs, and that they can be identified in exhaled breath before tissue injury occurs. The research will be carried out using a well-characterized in vivo rat model. Major efforts will be placed on the detection of methanol, a toxic alcohol and an environmental pollutant. This
