If you get billed for the same, you'll be expected to pay $750 for the upgrade, due to the fact that you've been on the service for the past 6 years. Worse, this is even worse for smaller businesses/home users. They're seen as "cheap," so they might not get charged as much. That means that at less than $150 a month, you're liable to get hit with a larger bill in the end. A good thing that you're unlikely to see filter that much going forward, since no one would want to buy an expensive piece of software if they're going to be charged $40 a month for their initial purchase. The justification for the price jump is the same for the Creative Cloud in the end—to keep up the revenue stream. This is the best you can hope for at the moment. Adobe does not acknowledge the problem. This is a problem with the software, not with the owners of the software. This will drive people to other platforms eventually. If you have the ability to wait 10 days longer, you can download the free evaluation version, use it for 30 days, and then buy the full version. This is a bit of a ruse, but good on Adobe for not trapping its customers into a long term license. You should not have to pay for a product that has a bigger price tag than the one it improves. After updating Adobe Bridge to version 1.0.1 Peter Fankhauser, CEO of FotoGalerie, said: "Until now, there was necessarily a break between the technical integration of Bridge in Photoshop and the actual (technical) integration of Bridge in Photoshop. Now, Bridge and Photoshop are working together on the same level. It is now also possible to integrate Bridge in Photoshop directly from within the browser itself, making it more straightforward to work with the implementation of Bridge in Photoshop."
