Determination of caesium in biological and chemical samples in environmental and clinical chemistry. Caesium is a problem element with respect to biological toxicity because of its transfer from the environment to the human food chain. However, its high availability in the human body is the cause of the successful occupation of nuclear physicists in Chernobyl, where the focus of radiation exposure was the ingestion of contaminated food. The analysis of caesium in biological samples has, therefore, been a subject of intensive study over the past decades and several methods have been reported to date. These techniques include the use of atomic absorption spectrophotometry, inductively coupled plasma mass spectrometry and hydride generation atomic fluorescence spectrometry, cap
