This study was designed to determine the amount of catechol estrogen in the lactating rat mammary gland. To isolate and characterize the catechol estrogen metabolites in the mammary gland, rats were ovariectomized at birth and implanted with a silastic capsule containing estradiol-17 beta (E2) on the day of birth, and the lactating animals were sacrificed on day 4 postpartum. Mammary tissue was weighed, homogenized and extracted with a chloroform-to-methanol mixture. The dissolved extracts were applied to a Sephadex LH-20 column, eluted with chloroform-methanol (1:1), and fractionated into two peaks. Peak II, which eluted close to E2, was obtained by high-performance liquid chromatography. The fraction was further purified by thin layer chromatography (TLC). The thin layers showed only a fluorescent spot which proved to be E2. A second fluorescent spot was found in the TLC of peak II, while an additional fluorescent spot was obtained from peak I. The fluorescence of the peak I was found to correspond to that of catechol estrogen. These results suggest that lactating mammary tissue in rats is able to conjugate catechol estrogen to its metabolites and that lactating rats have a greater ability to conjugate catechol estrogen than do pregnant or nonlactating rats.
