In the past, I've often said that I wish I were a professional photographer instead of a photographer. I was able to fend off that feeling when printing images on my Canon point-and-shoot's video function...but when it came to the editing side of things, I was constantly waiting for the images to be cropped and darkened. Neither of these comparisons is a fair comparison. I've never been a professional photographer; I am a professional photographer. But I've been using professional-level software for years. When Nikon announced their DX-format lenses line, they offered a "no choice" pricing for DX-format lenses: To buy a DX-format lens you had to buy two DX-format lenses first. You cannot buy a DX-format lens standalone. It's a pretty clever strategy because if you want to buy a DX-lens you have to buy Nikon's Micro-Nikkor lenses too. All of the Micro-Nikkor lenses (and the few third-party lenses) base their AF functions on Nikon's (and almost all other third-party lenses have become fully auto-mode-compatible as well). As mentioned earlier, the Apple Pencil is the only stylus you need to draw and edit professional digital images. Selecting the Apple Pencil as your preferred drawing tool is easy: Go to Preferences and choose the Pencil option. You'll see the Pencil is the default tool in the Recent category. You can, of course, use other styluses. However, I assumed you might want to sketch or write your note (or anything else for that matter) directly onto your PSD file. I was forgetting that not many people will have an Apple Pencil, but many will have a high-quality digital pen (I have no experience with Jot or Pigma products, and the Wacom pen on my laptop is no great shakes). You can easily import a digitized image of your choice and convert it to be treated as a PSD file by going to Image > Place & Create from the menu, choosing Place Image or Draw, and selecting the desired image.
